API Launches New Podcast Titled "1819"

The Alabama Policy Institute has launched a new podcast titled "1819," named for the year Alabama became a state, that will focus on politics, culture and faith from a conservative perspective.

Listeners can subscribe to 1819 today via iTunes and Stitcher.

"The podcast will focus on both the issues and the individuals who are impacting Alabama, and we'll bring our audience a level of detail and clarity not found elsewhere," said J. Pepper Bryars, a senior fellow at API and the show's host.

The latest episode featured an enlightening discussion of Alabama's landmark abortion ban with the law's chief author, Birmingham attorney Eric Johnston. The show explored the legal underpinnings of the Roe v. Wade decision, how and why the current law was drafted, what it prohibits and still allows and dispelled many misconceptions.

Past episodes included a conversation with API's president, Caleb Crosby, and another with its director of policy strategy, Phil Williams.

Future episodes of 1819 will cover a variety of issues related to limited government, free markets and strong families and include interviews with well-known Alabamians including business leaders, journalists, educators, office holders and others who are helping to shape our state.

"We're concerned with getting to the bottom of an issue, understanding all sides, and learning more about how we can best handle the challenges and opportunities that face Alabama," Bryars said.

Beneficial Insects: Welcomed Visitors To Home Gardens

By Justin Miller
Alabama Extension Service

Soon, gardeners everywhere will be spending a lot of time in their gardens. However, they will not be the only ones spending time there. There will be many insects looking to enjoy the developing plants as well. While some will cause damage, there are several beneficial insects that gardeners want to see in their gardens. These beneficial insects help fight against damaging insects and also provide other benefits.

Beneficial Insects

Lucy Edwards, an Alabama Extension home grounds regional agent, compiled a list of common beneficial insects and the benefits they offer.

Lady beetles

Known as lady bugs, the adult and larvae species eat aphids. Aphids are destructive and sap-sucking insects known to be a gardener and farmers worst nightmare.

Lacewings

The larvae feed on many soft-bodied insects such as aphids and caterpillars.

Syrphid flies

Also called Hoverflies or flower flies. Their larvae also eat aphids and the adults pollinate flowers.

Parasitic mini-wasps

The females lay eggs on insects such as aphids or caterpillars; their hatching larvae consume the pest and kill it.

Spiders

All spiders feed on insects or other arthropods and are greatly beneficial in the garden.

Benefits

Each insect has its own unique benefit it offers in the garden. A lot of the aid insects provide depends on the lifecycle stage they're in.

Edwards said these insects could be feeding on insect pests in one lifecycle and helping pollinate your plants in another.

"Without insects, three-fourths of our world's flowering plants would not be pollinated," Edwards said.
Plants That Attract Beneficial Insects

In hopes of attracting these beneficial insects, many gardeners will plant different types of plants just for these insects. Edwards said that beneficial insects have favorite plants they like to stay on. Some of the plants these insects are attracted to most are: Dill, Cilantro, Queen Ann's lace, Basil, Alyssum, Fennel, Yarrow, Garlic chives, Anise hyssop, Angelica, Parsley, Tansy, Cosmos, and Mints.

"Even though these and other flowering plants and shrubs are their go-to's, when desperate, beneficial insects venture to other plants," Edwards said.
Insect Pests

When insect pests are found in a garden, it is a good indicator of a stressed plant. Edwards suggests homeowners inspect their plants for signs of stress that is weakening the plant. Stress could be caused by too much or too little water, too much or too little fertilizer or the plant was planted incorrectly or in the wrong location.

Edwards said there are other ways besides harmful pesticides gardeners can keep pests under control.

"Begin with a healthy plant in the right location. Next, care and maintain the plant as needed," Edwards said. "People can use trap crops around a vegetable garden to attract the pest. Of course, there's always the option to squash, trap or wash off the pest insects."
